Gen. Grant and the Presidency.

KINGSTON, Feb. 3, 1880.
MR. EDITOR: I was pleased to read an editorial in your paper of January 30th, which you begin by saying: "We have never believed that the candidacy for President of Gen. Grant was demanded by the best interests of the country." I am glad to see, also, that your neighbor is occupying similar ground, although I coincide with you in the opinion that a large majority of the Republicans of Tennessee are heart and soul for Grant.

While, probably, most of those who urge his candidacy are moved to do so by patriotic motives, they will, if they succeed in nominating him, do more harm to his good name than Bourbon Democracy could possibly do, and at the same time endanger party success, and put to still greater hazard certain political results which the war was supposed to have established, but the preservation and political enforcement of which are still to depend entirely upon the Republican party, and not, as they should, upon the Government. Until the Government, whatever party is in power, can be trusted to give practical effect to these results, it will be disastrous for Democracy to gain undisputed ascendancy. The Republicans of the South should have no interest in the nomination of any particular candidate, unless it is clear that such nomination will contribute to the success of the party. They are vitally interested in Republican ascendancy, but not in the promotion of any particular man, however eminent he may be, to the Presidency. In choosing candidates, they should not be guided by their personal preferences, but by the interests of the party; candidates should be selected solely with reference to availability in making the race and personal fitness for discharging the duties of the office.

There might be an emergency when a man possessing the strength which Gen. Grant has shown himself to possess in conducting public affairs during periods of great peril, would be desirable and even necessary, but such an emergency does not now exist; the party which threatens does not lie in that direction, and the strength of a single strong man affords no remedy, unless it should be exercised in defiance of the Constitution and laws. Any one of the Republican statesmen now mentioned in connection with the Presidential office could and would exert every constitutional power in the possession of the executive to enforce the results of the war. Gen. Grant could do no more. The present, in fact, affords no opportunity for the use of his peculiar powers. The party of the war deplored for their safety now, not upon the strength of General Grant or any other one man, but upon the ascendancy of the Republican party, and Southern Republican will look in vain if they look anywhere else for protection in the party of the war. It is a political right to say, as much talk about the need of a "strong man," but there never was a time when a "strong man" was needed, or a "strong party" more than the present. Our party is in a weak party, and our safety is in nominating a man who can unite his own strength with only a pronounced Republican, but all of that independent element, with Republican proclivities, which now unquestionably holds the balance of power between the two parties in every doubtful Northern State. Republicans of Tennessee should bear these things in mind in determining their action in the National Convention; they should remember that they can do nothing themselves toward the election of a President; they should remember that the party which depends upon burrah and enthusiasm in the next election is the party which should be the party to permit their enthusiasm for Grant to handicap the party in those closely divided Western States which it is necessary to carry in order to succeed. They should realize the fact that the most available nomination, supported by the shrewdest management, will still leave the result in doubt, if the Democracy act with discretion.

Probably none of his supporters for a third term have a higher appreciation of Gen. Grant's achievements than I have. He is by far the greatest commander the Rebellion produced on either side; he rolled back the tide of invasion and ultimate repudiation, in 1873, by a single veto message, when the country was utterly at sea on the subject of finances, and the most influential leaders of the Republican party were carried away with the inflation heresy. Following this, his annual message in 1874, sets forth unmistakably, though crudely, the principles of finance which were afterwards formulated into the resumption act by Congress. Probably no other man could have successfully carried the country through such a crisis, but the very thing on which Gen. Grant was weakest, the administration of the civil service, constitutes what the independent element of the party is determined to carry to a living issue in the next election. That is to say, the party which by its nomination and the character of its administration, promises most to the direction of civil service reform, will be the party most likely to receive the support of that element, without which it will be impossible for either party to succeed. Those voters have time and again declared their hostility to the Grant method of conducting the civil service and to the influence with which he surrounded himself while President; they have voted the Republican party partially out of power on that account, and now to nominate him would be to defy them and plainly tell them we will neither consult their wishes nor ask their aid. To nominate him would be to act in defiance of the
